More particularly, the invention relates to the field of vaccine delivery using recombinant poxviruses. Still more particularly, the invention relates to the construction of vaccinia virus recombinants which encode fusion proteins. 2. Description of the Prior Art Vaccination is a widely used method of preventing infectious diseases. To date, most vaccines are administered as attenuated live, pathogenic viruses which, upon exposure to the appropriate antigen, are able to induce production of protective neutralizing antibodies. Although many of these vaccines have proven to be extremely useful, certain limitations have also been identified, particularly their inability to induce antibody production in some individuals. This problem has been well documented in the case of the attenuated rubella vaccine. Specifically, it has been shown that up to one-third of children who have been immunized with the rubella vaccine are unable to produce an antibody response to the vaccine (B. Calne et al., "Can subcutaneous immunization with attenuated rubella vaccine prevent congenital rubella syndrome?", Lancet 343:795-800 (1994)). The
