Cognitive behavioral therapies (CBT) have been the most commonly used therapeutic approaches in the treatment of depression. However, several psychopharmacological approaches (e.g. antidepressant drugs, electroconvulsive therapy) have also been reported to be effective. On the other hand, a small number of studies have systematically examined how people with depression think about the use of different kinds of treatments. In a sample of people with major depressive disorder, we investigated whether feelings of hopelessness, a cognitive phenomenon associated with experiencing a lack of efficacy in the treatment of depression, were associated with different treatment attitudes and preferences. The results indicated that stronger feelings of hopelessness were associated with a preference for antidepressant drugs as a possible treatment and with a preference for psychotherapy as a way of treating depression. Our findings suggest that patients suffering from major depressive disorder with a strong sense of hopelessness may prefer antidepressant drugs over alternative treatments. This highlights the importance of incorporating treatment-related attitudes in the clinical dialogue.
